prefers giving, estaries and mouth to rivers and mud substrates. It's often marked as the dragon goby or dragon fish. Goby's violet description has a long, slender, eel-like body. His dorsal and anal finish run nearly all the length of the body. The teeth are very sharp; however they are used to hit alby stones, not to fight. When kept in good condition, gob dragons are developing an attractive, identified, metallic silver-blue color with a blotch gold pattern. Gob violet is seen in pet stores generally 3 to 5 inches (7.6–12.7cm) long. In the wild, violet gob can grow to 24 inches (61 cm) long. However, in captivity they rarely grow past 15 inches (38 cm). [3] Men tend to be long, pointed to papula genitals, while those of females are shorter, blunt, and yellow in color. [4] Habitats and eating violet gob usually exchange brackish, rivers, and estuaries with a mud subtraction. Gob violet has very little eyes, and as these are sweaters primarily. The key methods of getting food is by scooping up gravel mouths and sorting food material from the substrate, and then spit out the substrate and swallow the cooking particles. They also use highly specialized teeth to scratch the stone algorithm. [5] Its commercial name care aquarium is dragon goby or dragon fish. The information offered in pet stores is often lies; This species has specialized conditions and will die in a standard aquarium. Gob's violet requires brackish water at least one-quarter sea water strength. One person needs a tank at least four feet length with a in sand or silt at least three inches thick (they spend a lot of time buried in the substrate). They are teritorial with their own type and can't stay together in a standard tank that's the same size. They cannot compete with common fish such as tetra and barb and cannot be controlled for a community tank. People are usually wild-taking, and may have trouble learning to eat commercial fish. They eat mostly on kelp, and in captivity must have access to food vegetables such as spirulina puffy or kelp war. [6] It is often sold as a very aggressive fish, but the violet gobs are actually well behaved, and almost blind. [7] Popularity, availability, and hardness This is not a very common fish among pleasures, perhaps because it's hard to find, both commercial and in the tank. Gob dragons tend to disappear in the market for long periods of time, but they are easier to find in stores within their natural range. [8] Meanwhile, they often hide throughout the day, coming out only when the lights come out and sleep properties. As noted above, they are often described by local fish stores as aggressively, unable to eat any fish that fits into their mouths ... when, in fact, they are simply detrivores. [summons needed] Behavior and aggression in captivity despite bad looks its strength, great lips, and numerous teeth, violet's goby is a predatory song. If well nourished, it usually won't disturb the smaller fish. Any small, peaceful, brackish water-tolerant fish can be koeksist and gob violet. Examples include mollies, guppies, swordtay, patches, goby annoy, and glass fish. Violet's goby is only caught with peaceful fish, as it has poor eyes and can be refreshing by pure brutal fish. [9] However, if two gob violet exist in a tank too small, one will eventually reclaim the entire area of their own territory and ferrically defend it. Temperatures, pH, and gob violet salinity are generally healthy at temperatures between 76-78°F (24-26°C), with a pH between 6.5–8.5, and salinity of 1.006–1.008. Eating violet gob are avengers in the wild and need an abortion diet for better health, but are limited by two factors, small sizes of their throat and very poor vision. Despite having big mouths full of teeth, these fish actually have very little throat and this limits the kind of food they eat. They eat both animal and plant-based foods, such as frozen glass, frozen tubifex glass, baby shrimp, and baggy vegetables. Unless they are in a specific species tank, violet gobies can't compete with other fish to get food, because of poor eyesight. Gob violet often nurtured at night. [10] They typically span in a group of one man and three or more women. Females require many hidden places, while the male needs a site to build his nest. Spawning is triggered by foods on live meat meat, and a decrease in salinity from 7 parts per thousand (1,006–1,008sg) to around 5 parts per mile (1,004), followed by an increase of 30 parts per mile per thousand regular Salinity Marine, about 1,023sg). The man turned up with several females on the neck in one day. After spasyal, the male guards the eggs. After 1.5–2 days, the eggs hack. Fry food enfusoria (particularly rotified) and green water (single alg cells) for up to a month. Then they feed baby bear nauplii nauplii. [11] Gob dragon diseases are sensitive to many common aquarium diseases, such as Colomaris and ends; which is the bacterial infection that spreads throughout the skin and ends of the fish. They are usually treated with antibacterial or antibiotic medications. [12] Wikimedia Commons has media related to Gobioides broussoni.
